No worries, as you are doing all the hard work and people like me are just throwing out suggestions, which must make it very hard to sort the wheat from the chaff.

One of the bigger issues that has come up a number of times at the various meetings across the Territory - has been the access to pastoral lease lands for the purpose of drilling and fracking - with the cattlemen's association now asking for a veto. Since all Territory residents own the resources under the surface and with the shale deposits in the Beetaloo now looking like one of the largest discoveries in the world - it seems that giving a few lease holders the right to stop any of that revenue coming in for the benefit of all - wouldn't make sense financially or equitably.

I believe I am correct in saying that Origin and Santos have already obtained access rights to the majority of the Beetaloo Basin exploration lands through a very lengthy process of meetings with all of the Beetaloo pastoral lease holders and have paid their legal costs as well - just to be sure pastoral lease holder knows exactly what their rights are. The fact that Origin and Santos have already come to working agreements with the majority of the pastoral lease holders in the Beetaloo would seem to indicate there is no need for any kind of a veto - especially to pastoral lease holders that don't own the land nor the mineral resources below that land.

Best regards,
Paul Brant

Subject: Recent news releases on the Beetaloo Basin

Dear Fracking Inquiry,

The following interviews cover the press release put out today by Origin Energy and will give you more detail on the rather amazing amount of natural gas in place in the remote Beetaloo Basin. The first interview is with Mr. Philip O'Quigley - who is the CEO of Falcon Oil and Gas and is a joint venture partner with Origin in the Beetaloo. The second interview is with a Mr. Malcolm Wood a well respected oil and gas analyst in London that has been following Falcon for a number of years.

It is worth noting that Origin is now comparing the Beetaloo Basin with the world class Marcellus and Barnett shale gas plays in the United States with 496 trillion cubic feet of gas in place in just the mid-velkerri B shale zone. This level of resource may be much much higher once Origin is allowed to test the other two zones in the mid-velkerri as this current estimate is only for the mid-velkerri "B" shale zone and there are two other shale zones, the "A" and "C" zones, that limited testing has shown to be almost as prolific as the "B" shale zone.

Best regards,

Paul Brant

Falcon Oil & Gas has "colossal" potential gas discovery, says Wood

"This is a colossal, monumental even, potential discovery," says oil analyst Malcolm Graham Wood, referring to the Falcon Oil & Gas (LON:FOG, CVE:FO) Northern Territory news today.

In a report, Origin Energy, its partner and operator of 16,000-square kilometres of licences, put the gross best estimate of gas in place at a world-class 496 trillion cubic feet (TCF).

Converting that to oil equivalent, it stacks up to 82bn barrels.

"Whichever number you look at, it's very substantial indeed," said Graham Wood.
